If more girls grew up to be heroes, the world would be different. In Rowen Milne's world, heroes study sword play and learn to slay magical beasts, but Rowen is full of surprises. From her departure to Hero School at age 13 to her insistence that there is more to heroism than the strength and courage of the warrior beast-slayer, she seems always to be aware of more options than those around her. Her story, in fairly subtle ways serves as both a feminist anthem for YA readers and a case for traditionally feminine virtues like empathy and creative problem solving opposed to the traditional male virtues of romanticized violence and warriorism. With her sword at her hip and her keen mind and conscience to guide her through stunning fencing competitions and heroic battles, Rowan leaves convention behind and on her way redefines the role of the hero in society and the meaning of heroism. Now it will include empathy, creative problem solving and self-discovery. Sometimes, girls just don't want to settle for "happily ever after." Although the external setting of Rowen's world is fantasy medieval, her psychological mind set is every-woman modern. The concept of the story of a thinking young woman in charge in essentially a man's world is a joy.

Novel Type: Fantasy/Action-Adventure / Values / Self Esteem Primary Audience: Girls Interest Level: 12 yrs & up Author Style: Third Person Narrative Mood: Mixed
