Volume two picks up where one left off, with the monk witnessing El-Râmi's work, though he was already well aware of it. As is often the case with this type of character in Corelli's books, he provides warnings and clues to the future which the reader picks up on, but of course El-Râmi is by no means convinced of their validity. In particular the "Master" tells El-Râmi that Love will be the force which releases her soul which he has chained through his scientific means, and he warns El-Râmi that he is on the verge of darkness. Even when the monk helps El-Râmi see a Messenger of God, El-Râmi decides it was a trick, though initially it does cause him to lose consciousness. Much of the rest of the volume deals with El-Râmi allowing Féraz to experience the real world from which he has sheltered him for so long. Féraz takes a different course than El-Râmi though, as the horrible behavior of the people he meets reinforces his faith and his character. Also in this volume is much more detail about the scientist Kremlin and his experiments which El-Râmi is helping him. The tragedy at the end of Kremlin's experiment foreshadows that at the end of El-Râmi's in volume three. The volume ends with El-Râmi alone with Lilith on the verge of admitting his feelings
