In today's competitive global economy, organizations are re-evaluating and adapting their philosophies of management, organization and service. Systems of pay, however, have been largely resistant to change. This work offers strategies for employee compensation that companys can use to increase their competitiveness and achieve superior performance. Based on a study of Fortune 100 companies, as well as on their extensive experience as consultants in developing plans for base pay, variable pay and indirect pay, the authors demonstrate how "new pay" can in fact help form a strategic partnership between organizations and their employees.
