The Dancing Universe: From Creation Myths to the Big Bang Marcelo Gleiser

In this provocative and engaging work, a brilliant young physicist argues that science and religion, far from being warring disciplines, may each offer valid, perhaps even complimentary, explanations for the origins of the universe. In this fertile territory lies the possibility for a greater understanding of the cosmos. Marcelo Gleiser begins by providing a broad, highly accessible outline of philosophical and scientific ideas about the universe through the past twenty-five centuries, from the universal creation myths of ancient societies to contemporary notions of an ever-expanding universe. He also explores the life and work of some of the greatest scientists, including Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, Newton, and Einstein, focusing on the beliefs and inspirations (often religious) behind the scientific creative process. Newton, for example, said that he worked in the presence of the Creator. Einstein spoke of a cosmic religious feeling, and Stephen Hawking has claimed that to unravel the cosmos is to know the mind of God. By exploring how scientists have unlocked the secrets of such concepts as gravity, electromagnetism, time, and space, Gleiser offers fresh perspectives on the debate between science and faith. Finally, he illustrates on how the origin of the universe has nearly come full circle with some of the oldest creation myths. Throughout, Marcelo Gleiser writes from the personal perspective of a scientist who believes in multiple approaches to life's most enduring questions and views science as an endless process of discovery, not only of the world around us, but also of the world within.
