Bonnie's train of thought inevitably led to her remembering her former husband. She wondered what he was doing as she lay alone in that bed. Was he still involved with the woman whom he had left her for? Or had he moved on from her too after finding somebody else? It was the first time in quite a while that Bonnie had really thought about her husband and she was rather shocked and disgusted with herself when she realised that she still missed him. Lying in a bed did not feel right without the man to whom she had been married for seventeen years lying next to her. She was almost ashamed of herself for still longing for his touch even after everything which he had done to her. Then again, maybe Bonnie was simply longing for the touch of any man. It had been a long time since she had consensual sex with a partner who was not offering her some kind of payment in return for her company.
